

Lesson Seven

Welfare

Aims

The aims of this lesson are to enable you to examine:

- the history of the welfare state since 1945
- the nature and role of public, private, voluntary and informal welfare provision.

Context

In the previous lesson we considered the issue of poverty and wealth. Here we examine the related issue of welfare provision.

Introduction

*A lot of good work has been done in the field of social policy but as someone once said, no sociologist has ever been called into court to appear as an expert witness. Psychologists, psychiatrists and lawyers are regarded for their professional expertise, but sociology has never achieved this It has failed to live up to its promise. So stated Professor T.H. Marshall in an interview published in New Society in June 1980, in a succinct way which sums up the dilemma faced by a subject without a set of agreed paradigms.*

Whether one agrees with Marshall (left) or not, it is evident that much of the Sociology we have looked at in this course so far seems a long way divorced from the factual world of the social services, with real people suffering real problems.

From the Marshall perspective, sociologists have turned inward on themselves, questioning their own ability to ask questions never mind finding answers.

To Marshall there is a factual world out there crying out for the attention of the sociologist whose knowledge and training is comparable to the diagnostic skill of the physician and the forensic skill of the lawyer.

But as Martin Rein argues in Social Science and Public Policy facts and values are integrated, with interpretation being all-important. Far from broadening social consensus by expanding knowledge of facts, research findings can sharpen disagreements, making the issues more uncertain, complex and technical.

The relationship between sociology and social policy will be discussed in more detail below, but this brief introduction should serve to show the essence of the issue, with contrasting sociological perspectives presenting a different image of the whole nature and aims of sociology as a discipline.

The Development of the Welfare State

The historical details of the development of the Welfare State are available in any book on the social services, and so we will not reproduce them here. Instead, a few general points will be raised about the nature of a welfare state and about its development in Britain.

The term welfare state is commonly used to describe Britain's social services, to express their comprehensive nature, covering education, housing, sanitation, public health, working conditions and so on. It does, however, tend to give a false impression of coherent and conscious development, and the successful conquest of the array of social problems to which it has been addressed. In reality the development of the social services has been piece-meal, with each reform being a response to certain social pressures.

It is certainly true that the major reforms of the post-1945 period were not the product of a Socialist or egalitarian ideology, but rather reflected a belief in self-help, aided but not replaced by the state. Indeed the famous Beveridge Report of 1942 envisaged the poor ending their own social problems by enforced payment by them into the national insurance scheme.

The 1950s and 1960s have been described politically as the era of Butskellism (a name compounded from the surname of the moderate Conservative politician R.A. Butler and the moderate Labour leader, Hugh Gaitskell) with successive Conservative Governments making as many additions to as subtractions from the services established by the Labour Government of 1945-51.

During the course of the 1970s, however, this consensus broke down to a large extent, with Conservative Governments cutting back on certain provisions while Socialist writers such as Frank Field have stressed the need for a wealth tax, action against the private sector of health and educational provision, and measures to prevent companies providing welfare for their higher paid employees at the expense of the tax-payer.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the Conservative Government in several ways moved further away from the post-war consensus. In the latter part of the '80s, Child Benefit was frozen so that this universal benefit did not rise with the rate of inflation and the intent was to allow it gradually to wither in significance. Also, the introduction of the 'Social Fund' with its limits to social security provisions in terms of the sums available at benefit offices and the increasing use of loans instead of hardship grants eroded a basic principle of the Beveridge Report. These changes reflected a resurgence of the liberal ideology that the state should have only a limited rôle, and should certainly not interfere with individual initiative.

Since then, the welfare state has changed again, in numerous ways. It is perhaps helpful to imagine that the welfare state has been divided into specific eras, based around the political stances of the government since the 1945 Beveridge report, and these are summarized below:

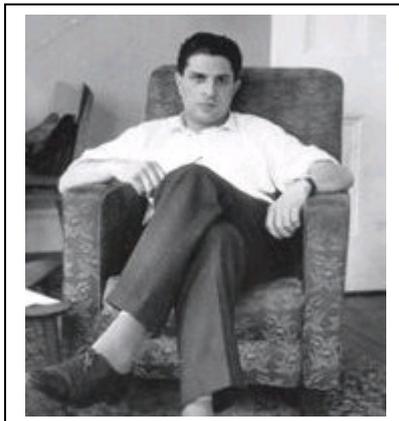

Era	Approach to welfare	Problems	Was poverty eliminated?
Post-war era – 1945-1979	Focus on eliminating the five “giant” evils. Benefits and services were mainly universal (freely available to all at the point of use)	Women were expected to be housewives whilst men went to work Immigrants from the West Indies were often discriminated against, e.g. not eligible for council housing.	No – although it was greatly alleviated. Public expenditure was high and so were taxes but poverty remained.
New Right era – 1979-1997	Focus on individualism (making people responsible for their own welfare). Benefits were mainly targeted and means-tested (based on income levels) to cut govt spending.	Mass unemployment during the 1980s meant people were literally unable to find work	No – instead, it increased massively.
New Labour era – 1997-2010	Focus on welfare pluralism (using a mixture of private, state and charitable services for welfare). Benefits were a mixture of universal and means-tested.	Left-wing politicians felt New Labour didn’t do enough for the poor, whereas right-wing commentators said they were spending too much on welfare.	No – poverty, or ‘social exclusion’ persisted.

Conservative/Lib Dem coalition era – 2010-present	It is quite early to generalize, but the approach seems similar to the New Right era. Many benefits have been scrapped and university tuition fees are rising.	Student-led riots in 2010 and youth-led riots in 2011 suggested the country was not happy with the current welfare state and economy.	Not yet!

A Marxist View of the Welfare State

Marxist analyses can clearly vary, with some writers seeing elements of the welfare state as hard-won gains made by the proletariat in their struggle with the capitalist system, while others see it as wholly designed in the interests of capitalism and its ruling class.

Whatever the particulars of the analysis, Marxists consider that the effect of a welfare state is to remove many of the obvious excesses of naked capitalism, and by humanising it make its overthrow a delayed or even averted possibility. This is sometimes balanced with an admission that the welfare state has improved some aspects of life for working people and has raised popular expectations, but Marxists refuse to accept that it can abolish poverty or inequality.

As Ralph Miliband (left, the father of the future Labour politicians) said, the abolition of poverty will have to wait until the system which breeds it comes on the agenda...

One interesting contribution to a Marxist analysis of the British welfare state is provided by J.C. Kincaid in Poverty and Equality in Britain: A Study of Social Security and Taxation.

Kincaid argues that widespread poverty is a direct consequence of the limited effectiveness of social security provisions. He argues that the social security system was never truly egalitarian in its effects, and that what limited impact it had has been reduced by more recent modifications. He points out that pensions and other long-term national insurance benefits are so low that if a person has no other income ..., he or she is automatically below the poverty line. Stressing that the problems of poverty can only be removed with a massive redistribution of income and wealth, Kincaid argues that most of the financial arrangements which under-pin social security have been carefully designed to minimize redistribution of income.

A 'Social Reform' View of the Welfare State

The development of British Socialist thought can be contrasted with that in other parts of Western Europe in that Marxism has not been central to it. A much more powerful intellectual tradition has been the gradualism and reformism of the Fabian Society. The stress of Fabian Socialists has been on equality as a means to social unity, efficiency, justice and self-realisation.

R.H. Tawney (left) pointed to the dysfunctional nature of the class system in that it created rivalry and resentment rather than unity and co-operation. Instead of pointing to an inevitability of conflict based on economic forces, the Fabians have seen both the need and possibility for changing attitudes and society itself.

As a result, the Fabians have enthusiastically applauded the welfare state, viewing it as a pragmatic response to the problems and needs of a modern industrial society such as Britain. Attitudes and behaviour can be shaped by it, and Titmuss argued that the way society organizes its health and welfare systems can encourage or discourage the altruistic in man. It is this view that has been primarily associated with a belief in social engineering; that changed attitudes can be the product of measures initiated by a reformist leadership.

The Social Security Budget

The social security budget in Britain increased markedly between 1979 and 1995.

Adapted from 'The Sunday Times' 21st May 1995

During the New Right era, the Conservative governments introduced a series of welfare reforms to try to tackle what was believed by some to be a 'crisis' in welfare spending.

In 1993, Peter Lilley, then Under Secretary of State for Social Security, echoed the views of many on the political right when he stated: 'The underlying growth in social security has exceeded and will continue to exceed growth in the economy....The underlying growth is above the growth that can be afforded for public expenditure as a whole....There is no escaping the need for structural reform of the social security system to contain spending'.

Quoted in C. Oppenheim: 'The Welfare State: Putting the Record Straight' 1994

Some of the main changes which were introduced by the government included:

1. Increased selectivity and means testing, for example, eyesight tests were once free to all but are now means tested.
2. Loans. Social security has moved away from giving grants to help claimants with exceptional need. They are now more likely to be given a loan which must be paid back.
3. Cuts in benefit. Some benefits have been allowed to fall behind inflation, such as child benefit, while others have kept pace with inflation but not with average earnings, such as old age pensions.
4. Privatisation. A number of areas of welfare have been 'contracted out' to the private sector - hospital cleaning services, for example.

5. Encouragement of welfare pluralism. The Conservative governments of this period tried to reduce the state's responsibility for welfare provision by inviting the private sector to take on some welfare responsibilities.
6. Community care. Many institutions, including old people's homes and mental hospitals were closed and patients cared for in the community, often by family or voluntary organisations.
7. Competition. In some sectors, especially in parts of the health service, competition has been introduced.

Activity 1

Now read the following passages.

It was in December 1992 that Christopher Clunis, a schizophrenic with a long history of mental instability and violence, approached Jonathan Zito, a complete stranger, and stabbed him to death. The murder took place during the hours of daylight in front of horrified bystanders at Finsbury Park tube station. Clunis had been a patient at ten hospitals, including the psychiatric units at four major London hospitals. His records were rarely passed on - there was little or no co-ordination between social workers, doctors and the police. In the words of the official inquiry, 'Clunis's aftercare plan was virtually non-existent. No-one was co-ordinating his psychiatric care and treatment in the community'.

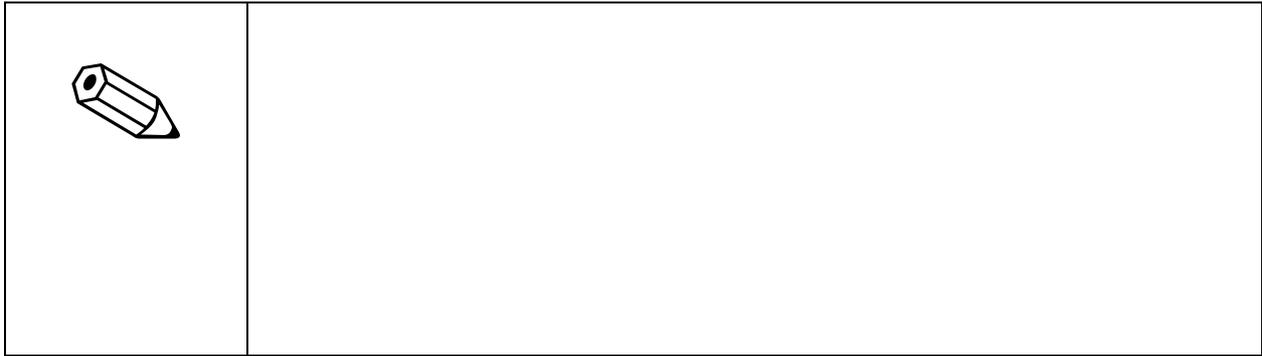

Adapted from the 'Daily Telegraph' and 'Guardian' 25th April 1994

Feminists have recently highlighted the true meaning of 'community care' as it applies to handicapped and elderly people. For 'community' read 'family' and for 'family' read 'women'! Feminists are suspicious of attempts to increase 'community' provision, seeing them as part of the political agenda of getting women out of the labour market and back to home, to provide unpaid welfare and health services for members of their own families.

Adapted from J Finch 'Community Care : Developing Non-Sexist Alternatives' in 'Critical Social Policy' No 9 1984

Questions

1. What does the first extract tell us about the co-ordination of welfare services?
2. How is community care seen in the second passage?

Welfare Pluralism

The 'New Labour' government that was elected in 1997 came with a promise to reform welfare provision. The government advocated using welfare pluralism, also known as the 'mixed economy of welfare'. This was to be a middle ground between the approaches of the first two eras of welfare. It is helpful to understand the different types of welfare provision, all of which are still being used today.

- Voluntary providers of welfare: Charitable or non-profit organizations that provide benefits/help/services to the population. Example: The Salvation Army provides meals to rough sleepers.
- Informal providers of welfare: Sources of care that are not official organizations. Examples: family, neighbours.
- Private Providers of Welfare: Profit-making companies who charge for welfare. Examples: private schools, private dentists, BUPA.
- Statutory welfare provision: Welfare provided by law, usually through the government. Example: the NHS.

Sociologists are undecided as to whether welfare pluralism is preferable to a welfare state purely provided by the state. On one hand, using a range of providers gives people choice. For example, if a patient is unsatisfied with NHS care, then private options are available. Using charities and families also helps keep costs down. On the other hand, there is the argument that the poor do not have the option to 'go private' and by urging the family to provide welfare, the government may be adding to the 'triple burden' of women.

Examination Approaches

The area of welfare is a growing one as far as examination questions for the AQA are concerned. The problem is that it is such a wide area, and certainly this one lesson cannot hope to cover all the logical possibilities. Remember, too, that welfare is linked with poverty and wealth in the syllabus, so if you are considering answering a question on welfare you need to study poverty and wealth in some detail. You need to consider the relationship between Sociology and Social Policy, and contrasting theories of the Welfare State and its rôle in combating poverty and other forms of social deprivation.

In recent years one major political debate has revolved around the rôle of the voluntary sector in plugging gaps left by the state in welfare provision. Also in an article in New Society in February 1981 Bob Holman argued that voluntary agencies would be unable to fill the gap. He pointed to the fact that they were already doing their best to fill existing gaps and, therefore, potentially unable to deal with any new ones that might arise. He also pointed to the dire effects that costs were having on voluntary provision and that their services were already being hit by local council cut-backs of expenditure.

The private sector of health care has been investigated by Ann Shearer who pointed to the growing number of clerical and skilled manual workers who were taking advantage of BUPA etc. In a critical review she suggests that employers have a financial interest but employees are still liable to tax. She further points out that pregnancy is not covered ... because it's not an illness, and that the problems of old age and incapacity in the form of geriatric and psychiatric care remain.

Activity 2	Match each key term with the correct definition:
A: Absolute poverty line	1: A store of capital. Obtained via inheritance or accumulation, e.g. via high salaries.
B Relative poverty	2: Referred to by Marx and Engels in the Communist Manifesto 1848 as 'the dangerous class'.
C: Consumption property	3: Having only what is required to meet basic biological needs.
D: Productive property.	4: Property that we have for personal use-clothes, cars, family homes.
E: Income	5: The belief that the state should not be used to bring about any social objectives.
F: Wealth.	6: The flow of resources, either in cash or in kind. Often based on market reward for skills ('earnings').
G: Social Democracy	7: Measured in terms of judgments by members of a particular society of what is considered a reasonable and acceptable standard of living.
H: New Right	8: The provision of welfare from various sources, not just the state.
I: Welfare pluralism.	9: Property that makes money, it is capital and includes factories, farms, stocks and shares.
J: Lumpenproletariat	10: A society with the strong supporting the weak through state intervention via taxation.

Self-Tuition Quiz

1. Why did Professor Marshall criticise some contemporary developments in Sociology?
2. What ideological assumptions lay behind the establishment of the welfare state?
3. Who wrote Social Science and Public Policy?

Summary

The relationship between sociology and the various dimensions of welfare and social policy is a problematic one, with the former having its own ideological concerns and the latter its practical considerations. While sociology has undoubtedly been valuable in highlighting social problems worthy of the attentions of policy-makers, and many social workers have been enlightened by the critical approach of many sociologists, it is inaccurate to view the one as the applied branch of the other. Too many other variables are involved and dangers are implicit in the use of a pseudo-science to legitimate policy decisions.

Synoptic Links

You may be required to make links between crime and deviance or stratification and differentiation with other topics, including Welfare.

In terms of crime and deviance, the topic can be linked through the views of sociologists influenced by the New Right in the 1980s such as Charles Murray. Murray argued that welfare regimes in the USA and the UK were too lenient and in fact provided no incentives for welfare recipients to find employment and support themselves rather than remain dependent on welfare benefits. Murray referred to 'welfare dependency', and argued that this phenomenon was responsible for a whole range of anti-social behaviour and crime. His proposed solutions broadly involved removing welfare benefits, or making them much harder to obtain.

In terms of stratification and differentiation, some theorists see the development of welfare regimes as being a key element in helping maintain capitalist society. In this Marxist view, capitalist society needs a large number of poorer people – as a reserve army of labour. It helps to keep the working class divided and prevents it becoming a strong political force. Also, a range of sociological research has shown how welfare regimes often benefit the middle classes, for example through the education system (the middle class make much more use of the state education system than the working classes whom the system was mainly designed to help). Feminists have shown how welfare benefits have frequently disadvantaged women, and been constructed around the assumption that women's place is in the home.

Self-Assessment Test (Lesson Seven)

1. What is the relationship between Sociology and Social policy?

Before going any further, ensure that you have read Sociology AS for AQA, Chapter 4, and also (optionally): Sociology: Themes and Perspectives, Chapter 4.

AQA Subject Content

The lessons in this pack of course materials are linked to the AQA syllabus (specification). Lessons 6 and 7 relate to Unit 1: Wealth, Poverty and Welfare.

You are required to study:

- Different definitions and ways of measuring poverty, wealth and income.
- The distribution of poverty, wealth and income between different social groups.
- The existence and persistence of poverty in contemporary society.
- Different responses to poverty, with particular reference to the role of social policy since the 1940s.
- The nature and role of public, private, voluntary and informal welfare provision in contemporary society.

Use the points listed above as headings for a set of notes summarising the key points from the lessons and the textbook. These notes will help you to understand and remember the information you have read and will be a valuable revision aid.

Answers to Self-Tuition Quiz

1. Professor Marshall regretted the fact that a concern with understanding and alleviating social problems had been replaced by more philosophical questions of the nature of man and society, which he viewed as a dead-end for the subject.
2. Essentially, the ideological assumptions behind the welfare state were liberal-reformist. In other words, there was a recognition of social problems and inequality of opportunity, and its aim was to enable people to provide for their own social needs, but with a 'safety-net' to rescue those who were unable to do so.
3. Martin Rein wrote Social Science and Public Policy.

Suggested Answer to Activity One

1. The first passage shows a complete breakdown in communications between people dealing with Clunis. There is no one responsible for co-ordinating his care and little communication between doctors, social workers and police.
2. In the second extract we are shown that if the state pushes responsibility for care onto unpaid carers it is usually women who end up taking responsibility. Some feminists see this as part of a political agenda to return women to the home to provide unpaid support to their families.

Suggested Answer to Activity Two

A: Absolute poverty line	3: Having only what is required to meet basic biological needs.
B Relative poverty	7: Measured in terms of judgments by members of a particular society of what is considered a reasonable and acceptable standard of living.
C: Consumption property	4: Property that we have for personal use – clothes, cars, family homes.
D: Productive property.	9: Property that makes money, it is capital and includes factories, farms, stocks and shares.
E: Income	6: The flow of resources, either in cash or in kind. Often based on market reward for skills ('earnings').
F: Wealth.	1: A store of capital. Obtained via inheritance or accumulation, e.g. via high salaries.
G: Social Democracy	10: A society with the strong supporting the weak through state intervention via taxation.
H: New Right	5: The belief that the state should not be used to bring about any social objectives.
I: Welfare pluralism.	8: The provision of welfare from various sources, not just the state.
J: Lumpen proletariat	2: Referred to by Marx and Engels in the Communist Manifesto 1848 as 'the dangerous class'.
